"There IS NO evidence for the existence of God!"

But does this claim not assume a notion of 'evidence' that conceptually excludes / makes impossible any evidence for the type of reality that God is held to be**?

- There is no direct physical evidence for a non-physical God!
- What kind of direct physical evidence could one have for a non-physical reality?

Why assume / require that there must be / can be direct physical evidence for a non-physical reality?

There might be other types of reality that are experienced ('religious-metaphysical') and other types of experience (religious experience) and other types of evidence (religious experience as evidence) than physical reality evidence- physical reality experience, types of reality that could be experienced and argued for "in a different mode"

Does the claim "there is no evidence for God" not assume / is it not an expression of naturalism?

Amounting to: "Since there is no reality that is not natural / physical reality, and there is no experience that is not physical-nature reality experience,

There is no (cannot be any) reality-evidence that is not physical / natural-reality evidence,

Thus there is no (because there "cannot be" any) evidence for the existence of God.

But all of this begs the question in favor of naturalism and against theism .

Assume that there can be / is reality that is not natural (physical) reality.

(Metaphysical or supra-natural -OR- mind or freedom or moral responsibility)

One should not assume that evidence for such reality would have to be or even could be direct physical evidence –any more than one would assume that evidence for natural / physical reality would have to be or could be non-natural / non-physical evidence.

Thus the lack of direct ' naturalism-reality-kind' of evidence for 'supranaturalism-kind of reality' would not be evidence that the 'supranaturalism-kind of reality' does not exist, but merely that it is not accepted or directly evidenced on 'this-kind-of-reality' terms!
